The technique of atrial septal puncture with double atriotomy (Custodian) was described in 1982 to create a right to left atrial communication in a patient with a secundum atrial septal defect. As the development of this technique has been extended, it has become essential to analyze the quality of the atrial septal puncture and its consequences. The initial study shows that the new puncture technique creates an atrial septal communication with a good anatomical and clinical result and a positive hemodynamic benefit. In the follow-up period, the main problem was the formation of an atrial aneurysm with a satisfactory clinical condition. The mechanism of such a dilatation is unknown and the treatment of choice is surgical repair. Differential inhibitory effects of glucocorticoids and specific antiinflammatory steroids on lipopolysaccharide-mediated interleukin-1beta production in activated mouse macrophages: correlation with the lipopolysaccharide binding site. Cytokine production by macrophages is known to play a pivotal role in both the expression and resolution of many disease states. The effects of various antiinflammatory compounds on in vivo secretion of cytokines from macrophages and other cells are still controversial because the studies have not used a highly specific preparation of the cytokine. The present study compared the inhibitory effect of various alucocorticoids and specific anti-inflammatory steroids on in vitro LPS-mediated production of IL-1beta and TNF-alpha in activated mouse macrophages. Macrophages were isolated from both C57BL/6I and BALB/c mice and activated with either 1 or 20 microg/ml LPS in the presence or absence of glucocorticoids or the following antiinflammatory steroids: RU 38486, ketoconazole, GW5074, furosemide and ciclosporin. The results showed that a 24-h treatment of LPS-activated macrophages with high doses of glucocorticoids (dexamethasone, triamcinolone, fluticasone or budesonide) and specific steroid synthesis inhibitors (RU38486, ketoconazole or f
